It is no riskier for women to carry out their own abortions at home with pills bought online than it is to have one supervised by a doctor, researchers claim.

By law, those in the UK can only have an abortion at a clinic in the presence of a doctor or a specialist nurse, and only after two doctors have given consent.

This includes medical terminations, in which women take two tablets up to 48 hours apart to end the pregnancy rather than having surgery.

But in a controversial practice, abortion pills can be bought illegally over the internet. Now a study claims that taking the tablets at home after an online consultation with a doctor is just as safe as an abortion supervised by a medic.

unnecessary and creates extra stress at what is already a difficult time. But others say that women should never be left alone to carry out the procedure.

The researchers, from Princeton University in the US, looked at the records of 1,000 women in Ireland – where abortion is illegal even under supervision – who had abortions using pills bought online between 2010 and 2012.

The service was provided by campaign group Women on Web, which asks patients 25 questions before sending them the pills, giving instructions and advice.

According to the researchers, these women were no more likely to suffer complications or side effects than those who had taken pills in front of a doctor or nurse.

The study found 9.3 per cent suffered side effects for which they were urged to seek medical advice, including 2.6 per cent who developed an infection and needed antibiotics, and 0.7 per cent who required a blood transfusion.

These figures are broadly in line with the numbers suffering complications after a supervised medical abortion.

Writing today in the British Medical Journal, the team say their findings have 'important implications' for the future of abortions.

Clare Murphy, of the British Pregnancy Advisory Service, which is the country's leading abortion provider, said: 'This study shows medical abortion with online support can be performed safely and successfully at home, and indeed is considerably safer than continuing a pregnancy to term.

However Marion Woods, spokesman for pro-life pregnancy care charity Life Northern Ireland, said the study did not provide enough evidence that online abortions were safe.

She added: 'Nobody should be taking medical pills of any kind without first contacting their registered GP or health provider.'

'Both that unborn life and the pregnant woman should and must be afforded every care, especially if the woman is facing a crisis in her pregnancy.'

'Abortion pills do not provide support to her, they only end the life of her unborn child.'

Possible complications of abortion include infections, heavy bleeding and some pregnancy tissue remaining in the womb.

No not always. Unsafe ones can indeed fail and leave mother alone extremely ill. I hope that eases your worried mind.

Life from conception is a modern Catholic heresy. There is no person until viable gestation and birth. At the stage of the abortion pill we are talking about a very early gestation indeed. In the USA Pence requires miscarriages to be buried which is why there is a movement called "Periods for Pence".

Julia - They looked at 1000 women, which is a good study size. What other variables at play are there?

Julia Bradley, Perth, Australia, about an hour ago

Buying online covers a huge range of sources. A study size of 1000 is not that large in terms of standard pharmacology trials. Ideally these women would be directed to a reputable source armed with knowledge and access to/back up of a health professional who has met with the client might they have any concerns after taking it.

A lot of medical care can now be accessed online. An online consultation with a real GP is probably better than not getting an appt with ones local GP or talking to the useless 111. People need to know who to ask and where to go if they have concerns that is all. In the UK they have been closing the very clinics that offer sexual health services. Perhaps not shutting them would be a good start and they need to be accessible. Or women need to be sure their own GP has the expertise to help and wont be judgemental about all those matters.
